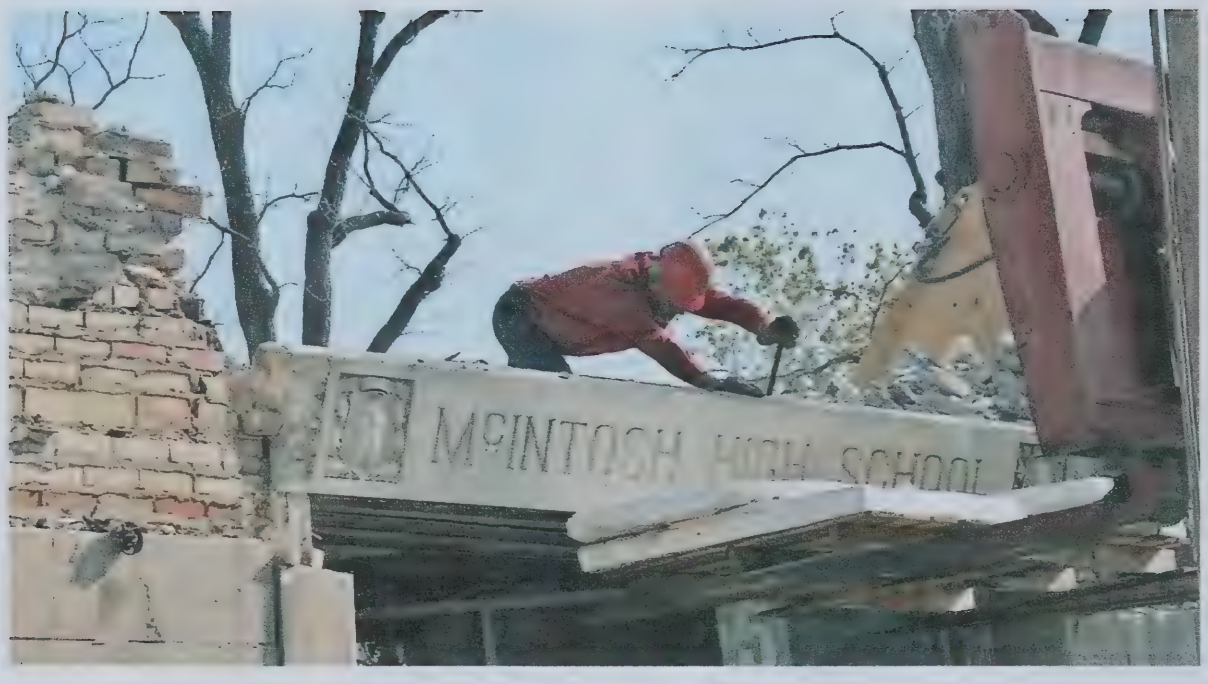
Farewell to McIntosh

Bystanders take photographs as a demolition crane tears down the last remaining section of McIntosh High School Wednesday afternoon in Auburn. Razing the 88 –year-old school took two weeks. By the end of the workday, only the limestone archway over the main entrance still stood.

November 7, 2009

A NAME TO REMEMBER



A demolition worker salvages a limestone nameplate above the entrance to McIntosh High School in Auburn Thursday. Workers at the site said the nameplate will be saved according to Steve Post of Auburn, who took this photograph. Crews demolished the 88-year-old building over the past three weeks.

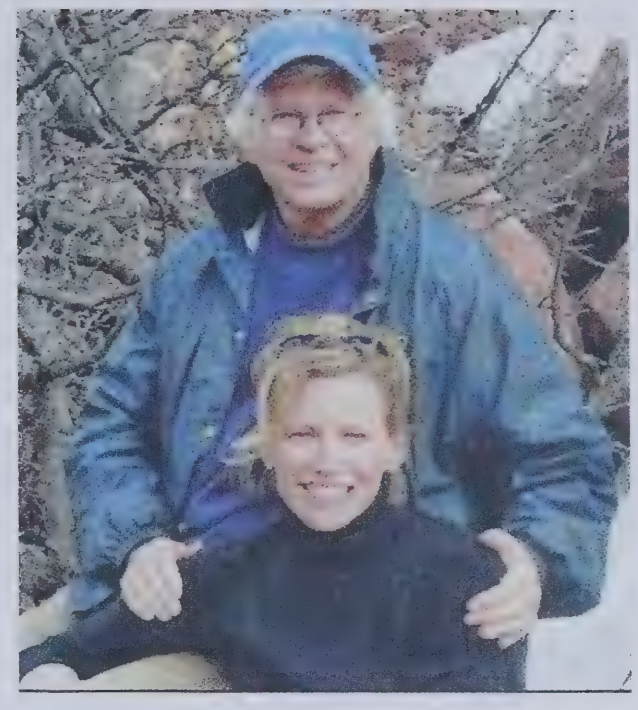
Dad meets daughter at age 65

Auburn native tells story in new book

By Dave Kurtz

dkurtz@kpcnews.net



Superior, Colo. - One year ago, Auburn native Mark Shaw celebrated his first real Father's Day – an occasion that waited until he reached age 65.

A few weeks earlier, Shaw who thought he was childless, had learned of a daughter he never knew existed.

Shaw tells the story in his newly published book, "Road to a Miracle."

The author of some 20 nonfiction books, most of them biographies, Shaw this time turned his literary talents to an autobiographical work.

Before the revelation about his daughter, Shaw already had written most of his book. It describes his colorful careers as a defense attorney, network television reporter, author, radio talk show host and as "the man who brought down Bob Knight." In what seemed to be the final chapters, he met his second wife, graduated from seminary training and settled in Boulder, Colo.

Then his life wrote the story's ending in a way that caught him by surprise.

Shaw's daughter, Marni Morrison, 41, was living in Red Wing, Minn., and recently had found her birth mother, who gave her up for adoption.

Morrison had been told that her father died young. But her mother shocked Morrison with the news that he was alive, his name was Mark Shaw, and he was an attorney in Champaign, Ill.

Shaw had long since left his law career and Champaign in the rearview mirror, however. His daughter searched for him unsuccessfully until an accidental discovery in March 2010.

Morrison's husband, James, was looking online for advice on how to publish a play he had written. He ran across the name of Shaw, whose books include "How to Become a Published Author: Idea to Publication."

"I just wanted you to know that I could not resist contacting you and maybe finding out if you are 'him,'" Morrison wrote in a email to Shaw.

Shaw said he barely remembered a brief relationship in 1968 with a woman he met in Minneapolis, Minn., where he took a job after graduating from Purdue University. But he could not deny that Marni Morrison resembled him and even more strongly, his late mother.

"Imagine, a 65 year-old guy like me taking a paternity test – and wanting it to be positive." Shaw wrote in his book.

When the test confirmed Shaw's fatherhood, it led to a whirl of happy occasions celebrating his daughter's birthday, a granddaughter's graduation and a surprise visit from his new family on Father's Day 2010.

Shaw came to believe that all the events of his life had been preparing him for what he called "the greatest gift one may imagine, the gift of a lifetime: a child"

Even without the inspirational ending, Shaw's book describes a fascinating life. It begins with fond memories of his childhood in Auburn, where "Marvin and Vera Shaw were patient, loving parents who put up with my endless shenanigans."

In the 1970's, Shaw worked as a defense attorney in Indianapolis. One day, after he "hoodwinked" a jury into acquitting a murder defendant, he told a newspaper reporter, "That's it, I quit. I'm done. Enough of this. I'm headed for Colorado."

In the ski-resort town of Aspen, Shaw met singer John Denver, who could be his double. Denver asked Shaw, "Haven't I seen you in the mirror?"

Shaw hung out with famous Aspen visitors including Jack Nicholson and singer Don Henley in a freewheeling village where police officers attended some of the wildest parties.

Shaw's media career began with a sensational crime in Aspen, when singer-actress Claudine Longet shot and killed her boyfriend, skier Spider Sabich. ABC's "Good Morning America" hired Shaw to cover the trial, which led to more appearances as a roving reporter for the show. CBS then picked him to co-host a prime-time show called "People."

Shaw's career and contacts led him to write biographies of sports heroes Larry Bird, Don Larsen and Jack Nicklaus, golf course designer Pete Dye and trial lawyer Melvin Belli.

In his mid-40's, marrying for the first time to an Indiana woman, Shaw became the stepfather of her daughter and triplet sons. He took a job as a talk-radio host in Bloomington and became a constant critic of Indiana University basketball coach Bob Knight.

All three of his stepsons enrolled at IU, and early in their freshman year, one spotted the controversial coach and greeted him with "What's up Knight?" The coach grabbed the young man by the arm and lectured him about respect. Due to previous outbursts, the university had imposed a "zero-tolerance" rule for Knight.

In the aftermath, " I violated the first rule of parenthood: The kids come first," Shaw wrote, "Instead of considering how this incident might impact my stepsons, I thought of myself and my distaste for Knight ... my main focus was on how reporting the incident might finally rid IU of Knight."

Knight lost his job at IU, and a storm of controversy surrounded Shaw's family. The stress broke up Shaw's marriage and led to an estrangement from his stepchildren that left him crushed.

Shaw found solace in turning to the Bible and reading "The Purpose Driven Life" by Pastor Rick Warren. He enrolled in a seminary in California. Writing a book about Clydesdale horses led to meeting his new wife, Wen-ying Lu.

Shaw believed he had found peace, though he still felt an emptiness from never experiencing fatherhood.

Then came the e-mail from Minnesota, setting in motion the past year of meeting his daughter and granddaughters and becoming involved in their lives.

"Being a father made me feel 10 feet tall, made me want to tell every father to savor fatherhood and savor the time spent with his children," he wrote.

"Certainly if this would have happened years ago, I would have not been ready for it," he added. He said his troubles after what he calls "The Knightmare" and his spiritual journey had prepared him to reach the destination of his "Road to a Miracle."
